With the rapid advancement of corneal topography and wavefront technologies and the increased application of corneal topography not only in refractive but also in premium IOL surgery, a new edition of the best-selling Corneal Topography: A Guide for Clinical Application in the Wavefront Era will be the foremost resource for both ophthalmologists and optometrists.

Corneal Topography A Guide for Clinical Application in

Corneal topography can be a useful investigation to show the true shape of the cornea prior to cataract surgery This can help the surgeon to plan the sites of incisions in cases of high corneal astigmatism, where the surgeon may either operate on the steep corneal meridian or combine the procedure with corneal relaxing incisions at the site of the steep meridian This would allow a better post-operative refractive result.

Interpretation of corneal topography (Table 1,2) Corneal topography is analysed using colour coded contour maps of corneal power with cool colours (green, blue) representing lower corneal powers and warm colours (orange, red) representing high corneal powers.

Posterior topography patterns are similar for both instruments; thus a distinct decrease of corneal thickness in the center is visible on Pentacam pachymetry map compared with that calculated by the SS OCT system (Table 1).

In conclusion, corneal topography determinations in neonates reveal steep, high, astigmatic (generally, with-the-rule) measurements at birth that flatten significantly by the age of 6 months. The method of delivery affects the astigmatic axis at birth, but not the amount of astigmatic cylinder.
